OKA DESIGN

My challenge in addressing the morphology of the bath was to transform surfaces and lines into an ergonomic and comfortable entity. As an architect, I consider a whirlpool to be a blend of furniture with interior space. I perceive it as facets of an inside-out iceberg, taken from a massive block. The individual facets are positioned so that they compose, through light and reflection, the image of refracted surfaces. At the same time, they direct massage jets to specific areas of the user's body. The intentional contrast between the sharp edges versus the bath's embracing fullness is ergonomically realized as one's body floats in the water with no direct contact with the bathtub's artistically designed edge.

From an ergonomic standpoint, I build on an experience gained developing OKA Design top model hot tubs. The layout includes two loungers and three seats, including a comfortable 'captain's seat'. A complete new idea is this being a hybrid position – functioning as a seat facing the others, or back part of a classic lounger. Its shape follows our previous lounger concepts, and represents a contrast between comfort and sharp-edged visual impressions.
